When I got married, my husband remained unaware of my inability to read for the whole of our marriage. I organized it so he did all the paperwork and I did the housework. I was sure he would leave me if he found out the truth. My two sons, Kevin and David, came along and I felt awful that I could not help as they started to learn to read themselves.

The turning point came at 60, during a period of depression. Christine, a volunteer from a local charity, came to read for me, for company. When she suggested we read to each other, I refused, but she was so persistent, in such a warm way, that I finally confessed I did not know how. She arranged adult learning classes but I was so petrified. To my relief, my tutor, Christine, was nothing but encouraging. We started with a picture book about the English alphabet, and to my delight, after six months I could write a sentence.

A year later, I won an adult learners award. Finally, I can read all those books I had wondered about. The world has opened up to me. It is such a joy to read to my little grandson Freddie, and my goal is to take my GCSE (General Certificate of Secondary Education). Now I feel I can hold my head up high. I just wish my teachers were alive so I could tell them that I was not stupid. I could learn to read. I just needed someone to show me how.

It was simple made of wood and goatskins. When it was dark, he carried the coracle to the water and rowed out to the Hispaniola. Hispaniola was thundering over the waves and out of control. It was low tide and the ship was beached. Jim hurried off towards the stockade and his friends. He found Silver and some of the pirates there. Silver told him that Dr. Livesey came yesterday morning and they made a bargain. Silver told Jim that the doctor gave him the map. He asked Jim to join them.

The next morning the pirates left the stockade ,taking Jim with them. They went in boats to the bottom of Spyglass Hill following the map. They began to run, desperate to get their hands on the treasure. They stopped by a large hole and cried out-it was empty.
